ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

Firstly to my wonderful husband Glenn and daughter Jessica who both encouraged me from day one and who provided practical support in every way possible to enable me to complete my research. My heartfelt thanks and gratitude to both of you for all you have done in order to help me realise my goal.

I am also grateful to my parents, my sisters Nerrida and Kelly, my mother-in law Esther Mundy and other extended family members and close friends who maintained their interest in my research over so many years and either read through early drafts of the thesis and made useful comments or asked detailed questions that kept me on track.

I have been humbled by the ongoing interest and support of my work colleagues at the Ourimbah Campus of the University of Newcastle. I am especially grateful to Dr Gordon Lyons, who offered to read substantial sections of the thesis as it progressed. I truly appreciated your brutal honesty and objective observations. You helped to make the entire thesis more logical and relevant. Colleagues and friends in the library particularly have been a constant source of encouragement. Special thanks go to Fiona Neville who not only assisted with Endnote challenges but also insisted on celebrating every milestone in some way.

Encouragement from the members of the Australian Storytelling Guild sustained me in the rough patches. They were often my implied readers as I battled with research structure and thesis content. I am also grateful for the generosity and support provided by the school community who participated in the research. Being given the opportunity to share stories over such a long period is a gift for any storyteller and the joy of the experience will always stay with me.

Finally, but most significantly, I am extremely fortunate to have had four extraordinary supervisors throughout my candidature who have challenged, guided and encouraged me. Dr Wendy Michaels understood the motivation and direction of my research from our very first conversation and set the research on the right path. Professor Lyndall Ryan challenged my thinking and my focus. Dr Josephine May and Dr Ruth Reynolds have been unfailingly generous with their incredible knowledge and support and have seen the research through to its conclusion. The academic rigour of the thesis is a testament to their constant attention to detail and ongoing enthusiasm for the project.

ABSTRACT

The value of storytelling in a busy world, awash with multiple sound bites, myriad visual grabs and a seemingly endless input of information, is recognized and utilized in an increasing number of areas in modern society, including in all levels of education. Narrative is used in all cultures to give meaning to the human experience. When narrative is presented in the form of oral storytelling this meaning making and relevance are enhanced by focused listening and people are captivated by the shared experience that storytelling provides. This thesis addresses a gap in the literature about how children in particular engage with storytelling.

In an innovative approach to storytelling research, this thesis systematically examines the observable responses of a group of primary school aged children to a long term programme of storytelling. 88 children across the school grades of Kindergarten, Third and Sixth class participated in 6 storytelling sessions each. This thesis places 12 of the videotaped storytelling sessions under critical scrutiny and analyses every verbal and physical response made by each child in order to measure both their individual and collective engagement with storytelling.

In so doing, the thesis canvasses the challenges encountered in conducting such systematic research and utilises action research (Bryman, 2004; Gray, 2004) in the structure of the storytelling project and grounded theory (Dey, 1999; Glaser, 1998; Strauss & Corbin, 1998; Tuetteman, 2003) in the analysis of the collected data. Storytellers who wish to conduct similar research are provided in this thesis with a replicable method and a project template they can adapt to suit their own particular needs.

The third part of the thesis is devoted to a detailed examination of what happened to the child participants as they listened to a wide variety of stories. Five clusters of Indicators of Engagement grew out of this research and they are employed as a means of measuring the individual responses to storytelling. The thesis establishes, in an academically rigorous manner, that there is indeed a means of measuring a listener's engagement with storytelling.
